Red Maple (Swamp maple, Soft Maple) Acer Rubrum

Red maple has one of the largest ranges amongst the maples. Its range covers most of eastern North America. Due to its dense crown (denser than sugar maple) it makes an excellent shade tree in ones yard or street. Year round the red maple brings some color to the landscape with it various red components. The twigs, buds, flowers, immature fruits, leaf stalks, and autumn leaves are usually bright red.

Sugar Maple (Hard Maple, Rock Maple) Acer Saccharum

Our national symbol and the centre of our Canadian flag is a stylish drawing of the sugar maple's leaf. In the spring, the sap of the sugar maple (sometimes known as sweet water) is collected and processed resulting in maple syrup and sugar. This process was taught to settlers by the indigenous peoples of the Americas and recorded as early as 1684. 40 litres of sap are required for 1 litre of syrup. Sugar maples are popular for shade, and ornamental plantings. The colours of the foliage are so spectacular that the tourist industry promotes bus tours of maple regions.
